In his work on comparative institutions, Professor Acemoglu has developed a theory of how deep initial conditions, including early settler mortality patterns and indigenous population density, can explain the emergence of persistent country level institutions associated with rule of law and property rights. He has applied this theory to quantify the causal impact of contemporaneous institutions on economic performance, and, to estimate how persistent institutional culture can offset the impact of contemporaneous economic policies on economic performance.